Jughead in "ICE GOING"

In 1772, shortly before the American Revolution, the colonies began to tire of the heavy taxes imposed by England. In rebellion they refused to buy British-made products. With this source of income cut off, England decided to levy a tax on the American privateers. "Privateers" were privately owned and armed ships, commissioned by the government to attack and capture enemy merchant ships. They operated for the most part, in and out of Narragansett Bay, in Rhode Island.

The British Navy sent a warship called the "Gaspe," under the command of Captain Dudingston, to cruise New England waters and collect these taxes. When the Governor of Rhode Island asked to see the Captain's papers, he was thrown off the ship.

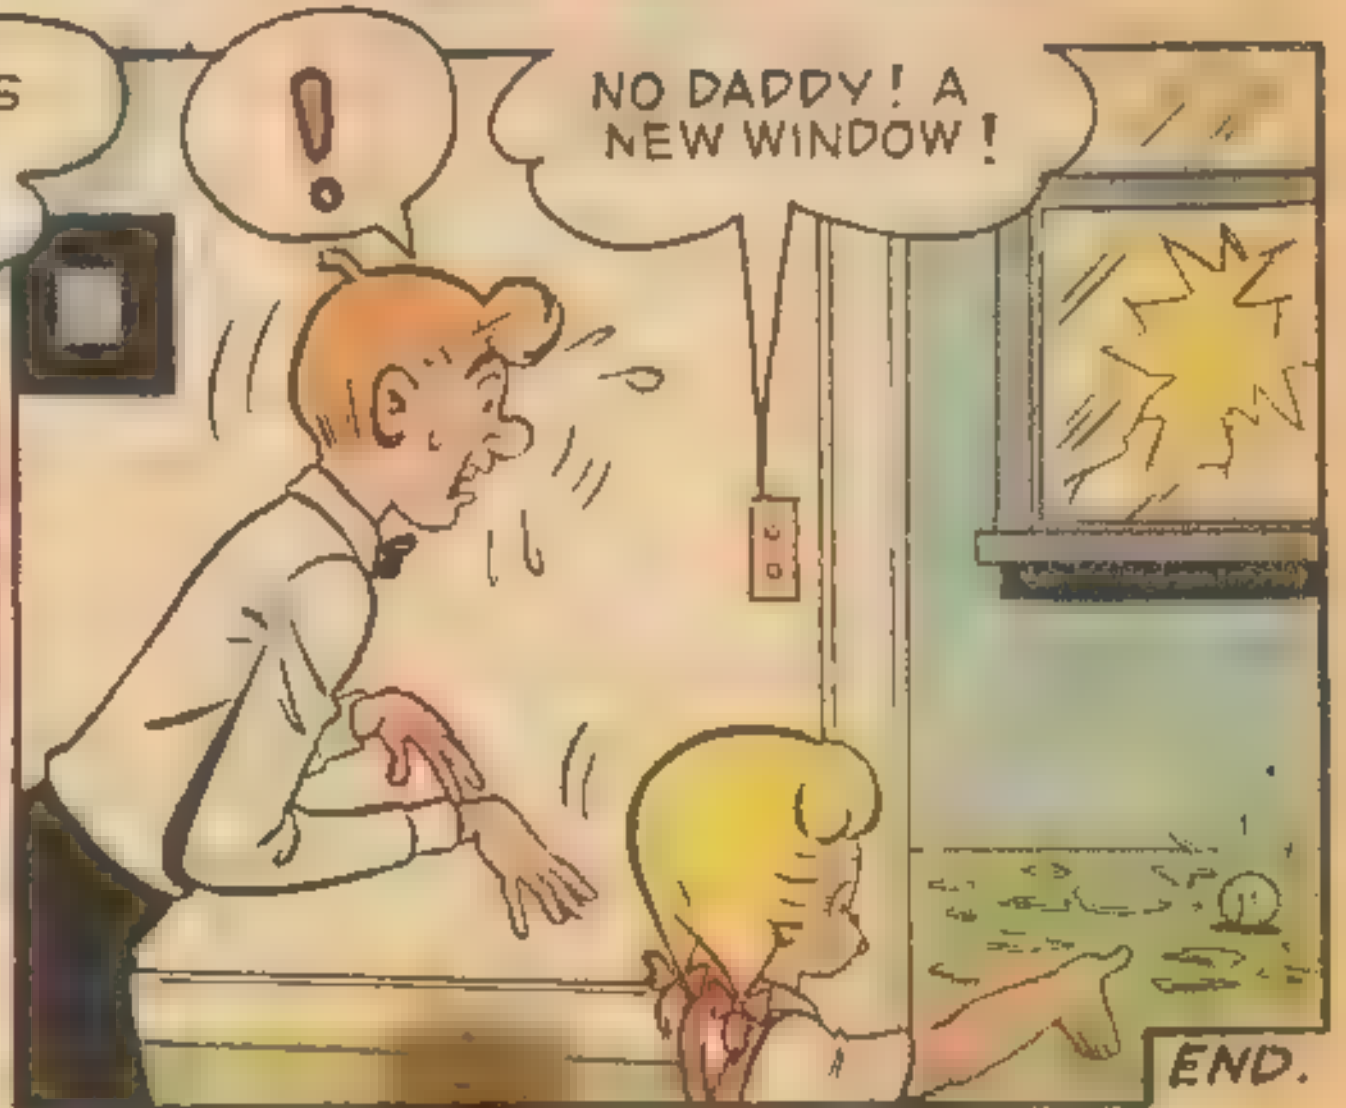

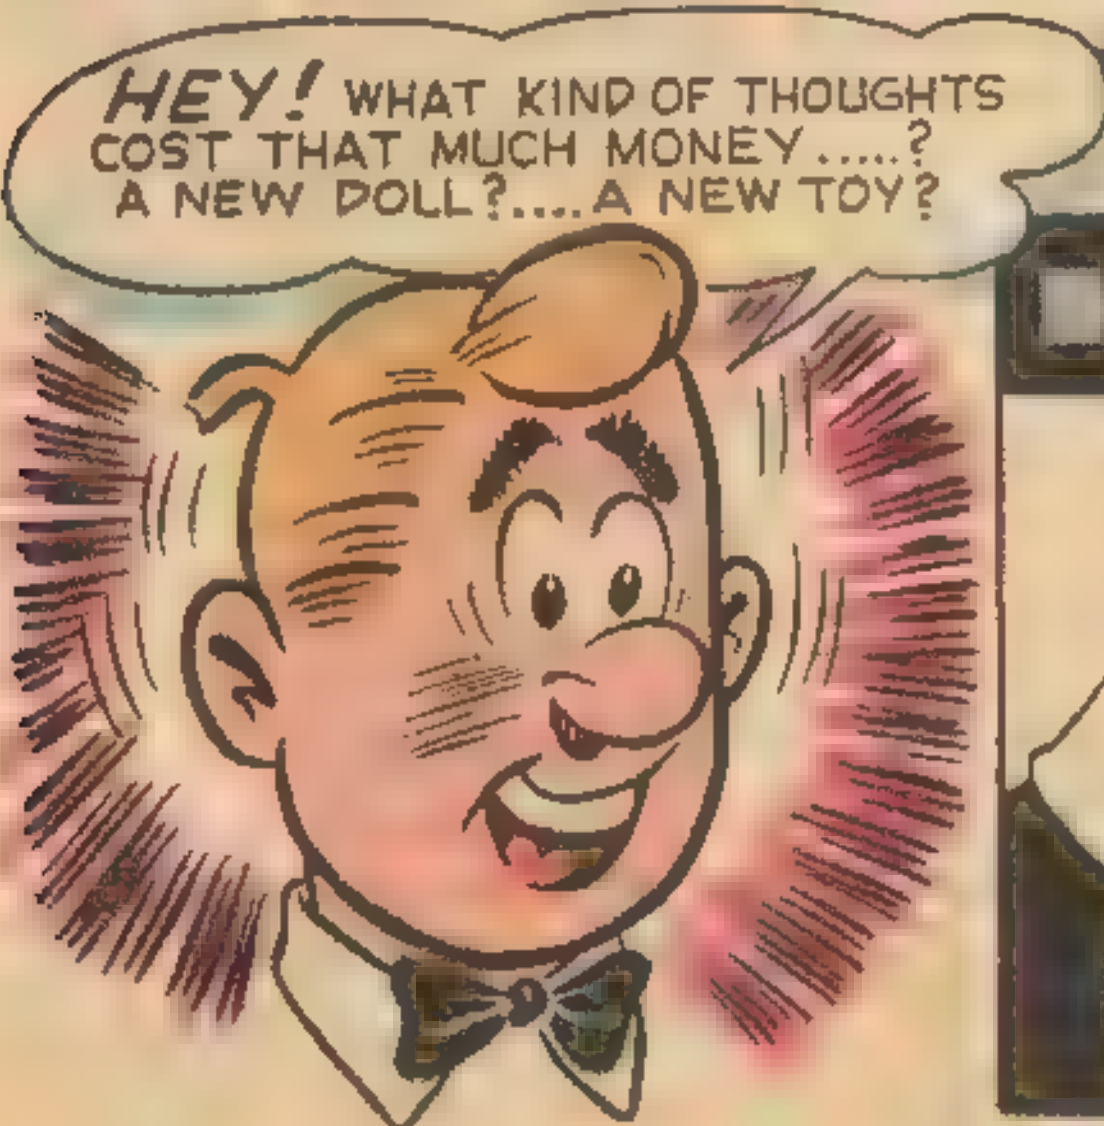

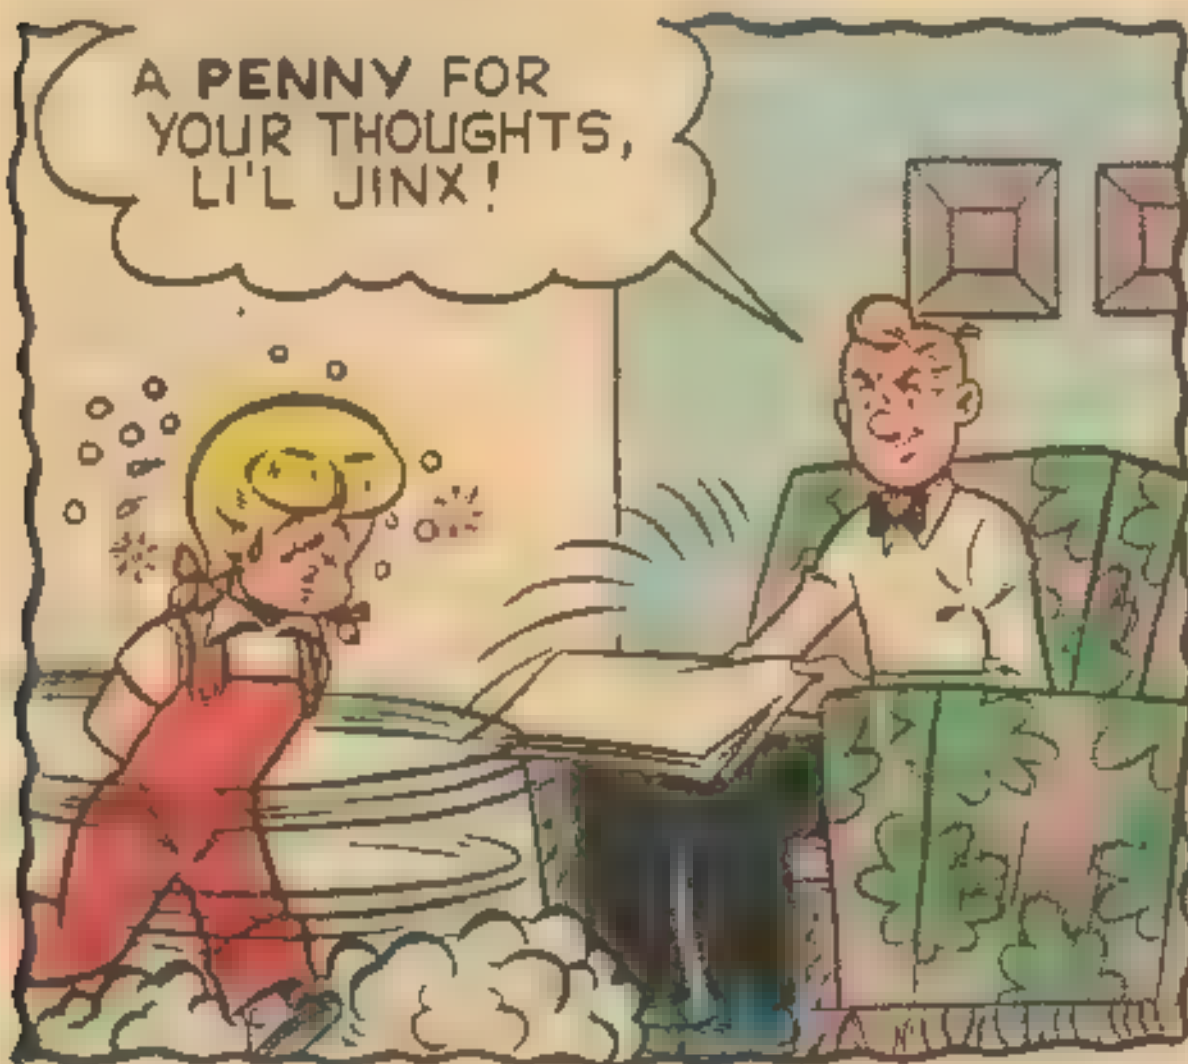

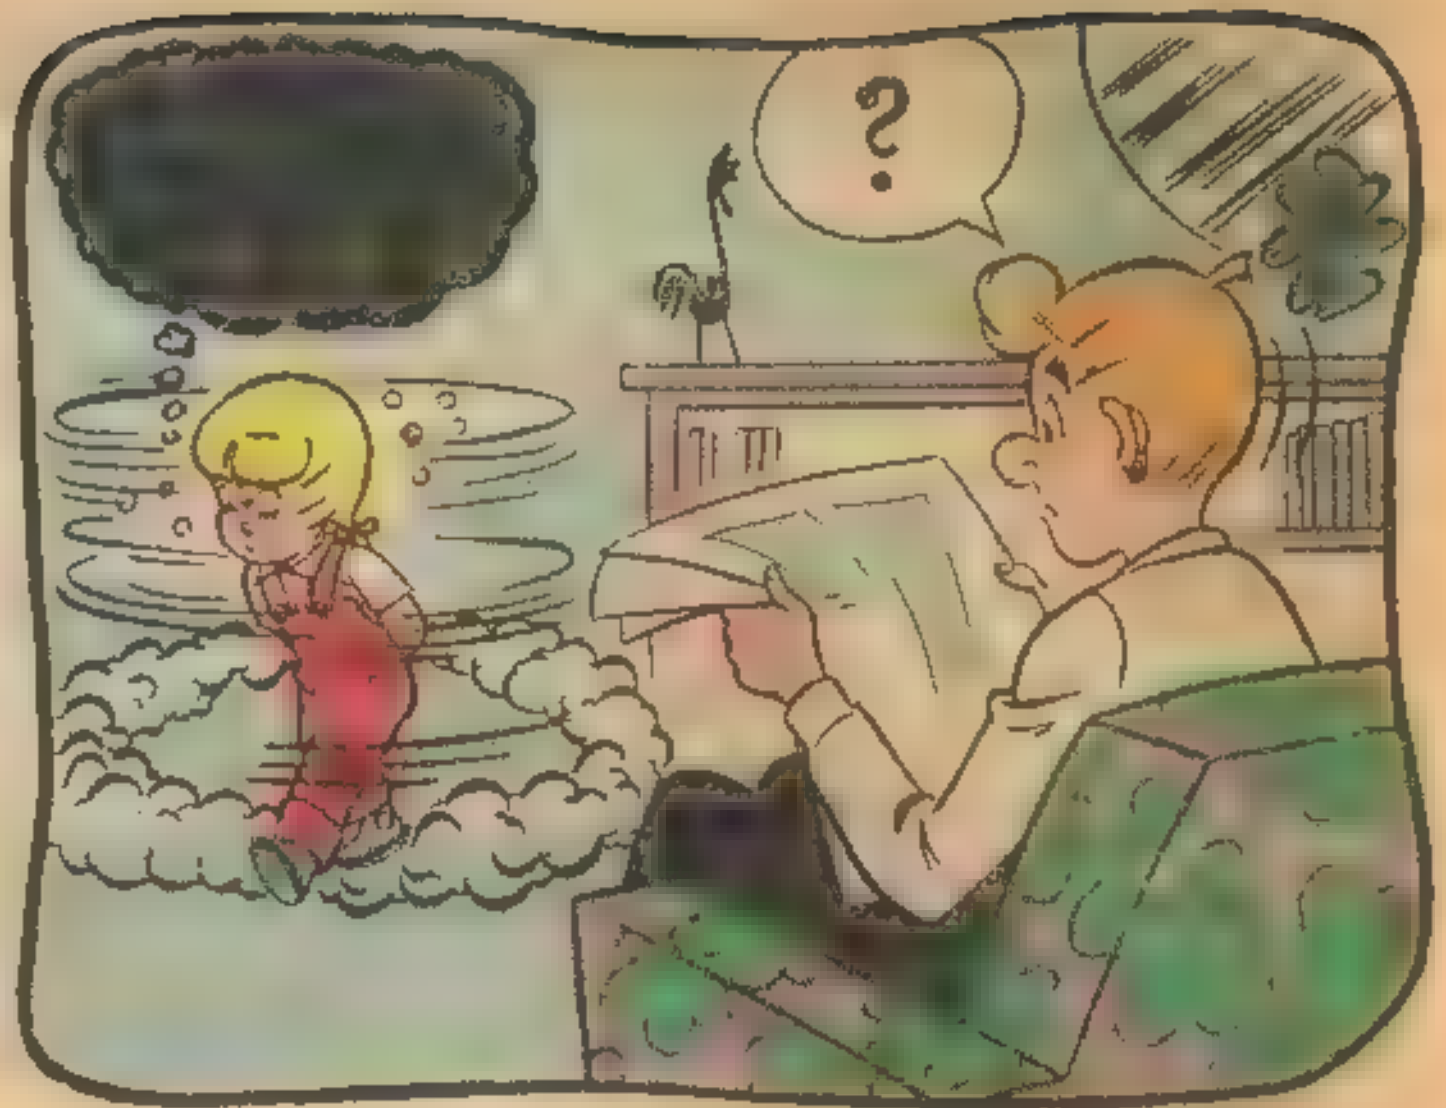

Captain Dudingston then demanded that all American ships passing the Gaspe must lower their flag in salute. The Americans complied for awhile, then one day a ship called the "Hannah" sailed by without dipping her colors. The Gaspe gave chase but the Hannah tricked the British ship into running aground on a hidden sand bar where she became stuck until the next high tide.

The Hannah pulled into Providence and told the merchants what they had done. On June 9, 1772, a group of men, headed by Abraham Whipple, got together and decided to finish the job. In the dark of night a dozen boats or more rowed down the bay until they found the British ship, Gaspe, still stuck on the sand bar. As the boats approached, Captain Dudingston fired on the Americans and was wounded in return. When the British crew saw the boatloads of men alongside, they surrendered and left the ship. The Gaspe was then set afire.

The English government was furious and posted large rewards to anyone who would inform on the guilty party. No one did. A few years later, during the Revolutionary War, Whipple received this message: "You Abraham Whipple, on the 10th of June in 1772, burned his majesty's vessel, the Gaspe and I will hang you from the yard-arm." It was signed by the British Commander, Sir William Wallace. Whipple laughed and returned this message: "Sir: Always catch a man before you hang him! Abraham Whipple."

NATURE'S NOTEBOOK

KING OF THE BEASTS

The lion has long been considered king of the beasts. Although this large and powerful member of the cat family has few enemies to fear, he is not a troublemaker. Unlike other big cats, the lion never kills animals for the fun of it; he only kills to satisfy his hunger. Most other cats travel in pairs or alone but the lion loves company and is usually seen in groups of 6 or more. They will not fight with one another over a kill like many other animals often do.

The lion, whose home is in Africa, roamed over most of India at one time but they have long since been killed off. The African lion can be found in grassy plains, in thinly wooded areas or in any section where there is plenty of game. This big cat does most of his hunting at night and prefers big animals such as antelopes and zebra.

When the lion attacks his prey he sinks his teeth into the animal's neck and breaks it by twisting it backward with his mighty paw. After he has eaten part of his kill, the king of the beasts will stand guard over the carcass until he's ready for another meal. When he's had his fill and leaves, the hyenas and vultures finish what is left.

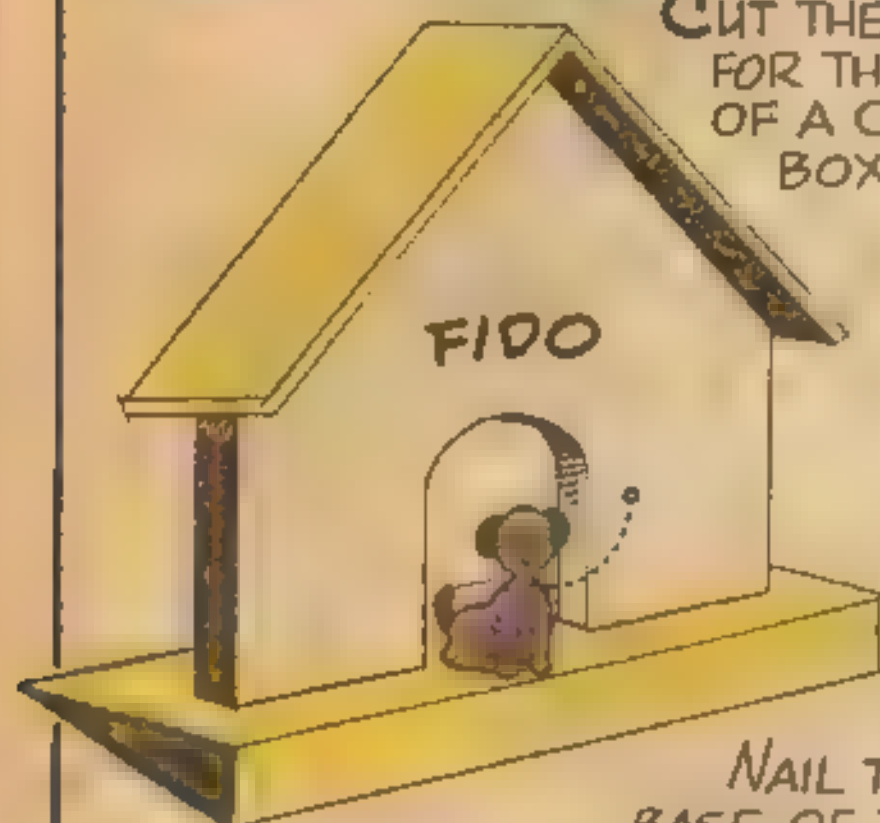

Unless provoked, the lion will usually run from man. Occasionally a human being is attacked and the lion must then be hunted down and shot. Once this animal has tasted human flesh he becomes a man killer for life.

A newborn baby lion is about the size of a household cat and reaches maturity at 5 years of age. A full-grown male is about 7 feet long, 3 feet high at the shoulder and weighs about 500 pounds. Its life span is 15 or 20 years.
